Opinions differ as to ageing in modern society. While some argue that ageing makes some older people's life more difficult nowadays, others believe that getting old now is better than in the past. Personally, I lean towards the latter.

There are those who point to the fact that growing old in the past was usually done in a larger and more stable family unit. Traditionally, younger generations would help care for and provide company for their elder relatives. This could be seen as being more beneficial than in today's smaller families, because often both parents are busy working. However, because of scientific advances, medical care has improved. If their family is not always available to help, hospitals or care homes can step in with a high level of expertise. This relieves some of the pressure on the younger family members.

Moreover, technological developments mean that older people can have a more comfortable life nowadays. With the Internet access widely and cheaply available, the elderly can still socialise online if they are not fit enough to go out frequently, while in the past the older person may have become lonely if unable to see friends. In addition, in the modern world, the elderly have plenty of entertainment online, such as films and a wide variety of television options, and even shopping can be done from the comfort of one's own home. The elderly can walk or exercise in city parks to build better health. None of these options was available two decades ago.

To sum up, I firmly believe that ageing nowadays is actually more comfortable and convenient than in the past. Today, there are many more activities available than in the past without needing to leave the home.

There are those who point to the fact that growing old in the past was usually done in a larger and more stable family unit. Traditionally, younger generations would help care for and provide company for their elder relatives. This could be seen as being more beneficial than in today's smaller families, because often both parents are busy working. However, because of scientific advances, medical care has improved. If their family is not always available to help, hospitals or care homes can step in with a high level of expertise. This relieves some of the pressure on the younger family members.

1 There are those who point to the fact that growing old in the past was usually done in a larger and more stable family unit. 2 Traditionally, younger generations would help care for and provide company for their elder relatives. 3 This could be seen as being more beneficial than in today's smaller families, because often both parents are busy working. 4 However, because of scientific advances, medical care has improved. 5 If their family is not always available to help, hospitals or care homes can step in with a high level of expertise. 6 This relieves some of the pressure on the younger family members.

The complexity of modern technology means that older people can have more problems living in today's world. In the past, it would not be a problem for the old to check out when in the supermarket, whereas at present, some old population find it difficult because they do not know how to use digital payment. Moreover, banking service is no longer as easy as it was for the aged population because some of those procedures have been digitalized and this has upset them to some extent.

To sum up, I firmly believe that ageing nowadays is actually more comfortable and convenient than in the past. Today, there are many more activities available than in the past without needing to leave the home. (sample1)

Personally, I believe that ageing in the modern world has been largely more comfortable and convenient for the older generations than in the past. Nowadays, there are many more activities available than in the past without needing to leave the home. Although modern lifestyle has posed some challenges and medical care seems to be more costly, with better science and technology, many diseases are no longer painful or deadly, which greatly improves older people's living quality and life expectancy.
